ATTN: Sean Marcus

Dear Sean:

As we discussed today, here are copies of two speeches by Director Woolsey in which he includes remarks regarding steps the Agency is taking regarding the Ames case. They are as follows:

Address by Director of Central Intelligence Before the Conference on "The Origins and Development of the CIA in the Administration of Harry S. Truman, Thursday, March 17, 1994;

Intelligence and Law Enforcement, Address by Director Woolsey Before the American Bar Association, Washington, D.C., April 29, 1994.

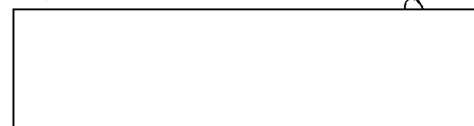

I trust this information will be of assistance to you in responding to your constituent.

Intelligence and Law Enforcement
Address by R. James Woolsey
Director of Central Intelligence
Before the American Bar Association
Washington, D.C., April 29, 1994

For forty years, the central feature of American foreign policy was containing the Soviet Union and its allies, with the intelligence community supporting the President and the Congress in meeting the challenge of the cold war. One of the many features of that period was that, beyond the task of counter-intelligence, the worlds of law enforcement and intelligence rarely intersected. Each world had different mandates -- enshrined in law -- and different missions.

That is changing.

Granted, both worlds still have distinctive missions. We in the intelligence business must help policymakers who are working to protect the potential gains from the past five revolutionary years, and we must provide critical warning time to the President and his advisors on the regional threats from such nations as North Korea or Iraq, which have far different conceptions of a post-cold war era than we and our friends and allies have.

But we also need to tackle new and growing threats that can transcend borders: the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, terrorism, international organized crime, and
